Two Men Well Known in District Lose Lives in Burning Plane Which Crashes Near Torrance

Two men were instantly killed yesterday morning when an airplane wing collapsed and the plane crashed into Torrance.

The dead men are Douglas Boldin and Harry Weimouth, 325 West 150th street. Boldin lived at Short's airport on Harbor boulevard, where he was an instructor. Both were well known in Torrance. The plane burst into flames after it hit the ground. Both bodies were badly burned.

Boldin and Weimouth, a student flyer, took off from the airport and attendants became alarmed when they failed to come back a half-hour later.

Eye-witnesses told deputy sheriffs that the plane was flying along on an even keel when one of the wings folded back against the fuselage.

An investigation by several aviators resulted in the decision that the propeller had evidently split in midair and fragments tore through the wing. Witnesses stated that just before the wing was seen to crumble the rear of the motor greatly increased, as would have been caused by the propeller snapping. One-half of the propeller could not be found.

One of the witnesses, Viola Linger, 1028 Los Angeles street, saw the tragedy from the yard of friends a short distance from where the plane landed.

"I saw the plane flying above my head. Then all of a sudden the wing snapped back and the plane crashed to the ground. As soon as it hit, it burst into flames," she said.

The broken wing was found in a field hundreds of yards from where the plane landed, on Southern avenue just off Western avenue. The plane narrowly missed crashing into the roof of a house.

Attendees at Short's airport stated that the airplane was licensed by the government and that Boldin was a licensed pilot.

The plane had been thoroughly checked over before it left the ground and was reported in good condition, according to airport officials. Weimouth had a student's license, which the airport requires of its pupils.
